Protection de l'environnement : les gaz du lac Kivu menacent (French Edition) Michel Chirhuza Bagisha
Cours d’eau entre la République Démocratique du Congo et le Rwanda, le lac Kivu contient une grande quantité de gaz méthane et de dioxyde de carbone. Ces gaz s’accumulent de plus en plus et risquent de s’échapper à la suite d’un tremblement de terre, d’une éruption volcanique ou d’une mauvaise extraction par des entreprises. Or, le gaz méthane est une richesse. Il peut servir de combustible ou servir à produire de l’électricité pour la sous – région des grands lacs d’Afrique. Dans cette partie du continent, des ressources telles que le bois sont très exploitées faute d’électricité. L’ouvrage invite alors la République Démocratique du Congo et le Rwanda à s’accorder sur la gestion du lac Kivu. Ils devront par ailleurs se convenir sur des conditions de surveillance et d’extraction commune ou séparée des gaz qu’il contient. Ces mesures permettront notamment de rentabiliser le gaz méthane, de prévenir toute catastrophe pouvant mettre en danger des vies humaines et animales autour du lac. Elles permettront également de répondre à tout sinistre causé par des substances gazeuses de ce lac.
