Yucca Mountain: A Rhetorical Situation Michael Freborg
This essay is a rhetorical analysis of U.S. Representative Shelley Berkley's testimony before the Subcommittee on Energy and Power (106th Congress) regarding the hearing of House Resolution Bill 45 (H.R. 45), also known as the "Nuclear Waste Policy Act of 1999." If the bill passed, legislation would have allowed the transportation and storage of 70,000 tons of high-level nuclear waste at a temporary site near Yucca Mountain in Southern Nevada. Using the rhetorical situation, as described by American rhetorician Lloyd Bitzer, this essay illustrates how exigence, audience, and constraints are visible in Berkley's testimony. It also demonstrates how Yucca Mountain's wide range of discussability allows Berkley to effectively attack the Yucca Mountain legislation from multiple angles by using an arsenal of clarification devices and powerful metaphors. This essay also covers a brief history of nuclear waste disposal in the United States and the geological features of the Yucca Mountain region.
